They reckon there's nothing new under the sun when it comes to clothes but "they" are wrong.

When a builder mate of Chris Doolan visited Sweden he was blown away by the most amazing, innovative workwear designed specifically for tradesmen who believe in efficiency and safety.

When he discussed what was available in Australia he was told we are 20 years behind. On his return he said to former project manager Doolan, "You'd better get on to this," and the rest, as they say, is history, albeit very recent history.

Doolan established Skillers Workwear, a revolutionary concept in work clothing designed to meet the specific needs of skilled professional plumbers, carpenters and other building contractors.

Think of a vest that has large arm holes for ventilation, and special pockets designed specifically for a whole range of tradesmen's necessities from phone, tools and pens to two tape measure pockets with straps, large inner pockets for documents and gloves, chest pockets for keys and wallet and four roomy holster pockets, two in the front and two in the back, which hang freely allowing you to carry tools and fittings in safety and comfort.

Add a belt to distribute the weight evenly between shoulders and lower back, a two-way zip which can be opened from the bottom up to allow for more ventilation, and a mesh back which also provides ventilation.

This system of belt, harness, suspenders and pouches helps you carry the weight of your tools and equipment evenly and lessens fatigue and lower back pain because you're not carrying all that weight just on your hips.

Skillers also have equally clever holster pocket pants and both vest and pants can be individualised to suit the wearer's own way of working.

These are clothes that are far more than just clothes. They are tools for skilled tradesmen.
